Q.1 Read the story opening, then answer the questions below. 15 points

Z for Zachariah

A figure is staring at a spot on the horizon. Looking through a pair of binoculars, this person sees a column of smoke. Frightened by what this could mean, the person watches day by day as the column of smoke comes closer.

May 20th. I am afraid. Someone is coming. That is, I think someone is coming, though I am not sure, and I pray that I am wrong ...

But there is smoke. For three days there has been smoke, not like the time before. That time, last year, it rose in a great cloud a long way away, and stayed in the sky for two weeks. A forest fire in the dead woods, and then it rained, and the smoke stopped. But this time it is a thin column, like a pole, not very high.

And the column has come three times, each time in the late afternoon. At night I cannot see it, and in the morning it is gone. But each afternoon it comes again, and it is nearer. At first, it was behind Claypole Ridge and I could only see the top of it, the smallest smudge. I got the binoculars and saw that it was narrow and straight; it was smoke from a small fire. When we used to go in the truck, Claypole Ridge was fifteen miles, though it looks closer, and the smoke was coming from behind that. Beyond Claypole Ridge there is Ogdentown, about ten miles further. But there is no one left alive in Ogdentown.

I know, because after the war ended, and all the telephones went dead, my father, my brother Joseph and cousin David went in the truck to find out what was happening, and the first place they went was Ogdentown. Joseph and David were really excited, but Father looked serious.

When they came back it was dark. Mother had been worrying - they took so long - so we were glad to see the truck lights finally coming over Burden Hill, six miles away. They looked like beacons. They were the only lights anywhere - no other cars had come down all day. We knew it was the truck because one of the lights, the left one, always blinked when it went over a bump. The boys weren't excited anymore. They looked scared, and my father looked sick. Maybe he was beginning to be sick, but mainly I think he was distressed.

"What did you find?" He said, "Bodies. Just dead bodies. They're all dead." My father sat down. "Terrible," he said. "We drove around, looking. We blew the horn. Then we went to the church and rang the bell." My brother Joseph began to cry. He was fourteen.

May 21st. It is coming closer. Today it was almost on top of the ridge, though not quite, because when I looked with the binoculars I could not see the flame, but still only smoke. I know where it is: at the crossroads. Just on the other side of the ridge, the east-west highway, the Dean Town road, crosses our road. He has stopped there and is deciding whether to follow number nine or come over the ridge. If he decides to follow the highway he will go away, and everything will be all right again. But if he comes to the top of the ridge, he is sure to come down here, because he will see the green leaves.

There are some things I need to explain. One is why I am afraid. Another is why I am writing in this composition book, which I got from Klein's store a mile up the road. By then the last radio station, a very faint one that I could hear only at night, had stopped broadcasting. It had been dead for about three or four months. I discovered I was forgetting when things happened. Another reason I got it is that writing it might be like having someone to talk to. But the truth is I haven't written in it much after all, because there isn't much to write about.

But now I have something to write about. I was wrong. I am not the only person left in the world. I am both excited and afraid. (by Robert O'Brien)
