Say 'Yum' to Healthy Eating!

The Mediterranean diet has had a lot of publicity as one of the healthiest eating plans there is. People who live around the Mediterranean Sea are famous for eating plenty of fruits and vegetables, nuts and herbs - which are packed with vitamins and minerals - as well as wheat, rice and plant protein like beans. They also eat medium amounts of fish, chicken and eggs, and dairy products such as butter, cheese and yoghurt, with only a limited amount of red meat. (1) ..... On top of that, it is rich in the type of fats that are good for the body rather than processed fats, which can be harmful.

Italy offers a good example of a place where youngsters are being encouraged to follow this healthy diet. The Italian Ministry of Health works closely with schools on a national plan for school lunches. They provide rules that make sure school meals follow the Mediterranean diet. (2) .....

At the same time, Italian schools don't just care about nutrition. Like all school pupils, Italian children spend time in the school canteen filling up on much-needed calories and chatting with their friends. (3) ..... They learn about where different types of foods actually come from and how to prepare fresh, local ingredients to create traditional, regional dishes. Through this, children can learn to develop healthy eating choices for the rest of their lives. In addition, young people spend quality time eating together, which plays a significant role in Italian culture.

The school canteen tries to create a family eating experience. (4) ..... The setting encourages eating respectfully and carefully, and promotes the idea of 'slow food'. Slow food, as opposed to fast food, connects the world of eating with the world of farming.

(5) ..... The programme follows a carefully planned daily menu that offers a balanced meal for each child. A main course could be pasta with tomato sauce and vegetables or sometimes meat. As a side dish there might be cooked vegetables or fresh salad leaves. Everyone at the table drinks water rather than fizzy drinks that are high in sugar. A common way to end a meal is often with fresh fruit that is in season or a simple dessert.
